
THE KELVIN AQUEDUCT
Opened in 1790, the aqueduct was designed by Robert Whitworth and constructed by William Gibb and John Muir. At 400 feet (122 metres) it was Britain's longest aqueduct and was a popular tourist attraction. The aqueduct was a key structure in the development of the Forth & Clyde Canal and thus Scotland's industrial growth.
Plaque erected in 2016
by
The Institution of Civil Engineers Glasgow and West of Scotland